

New Jersey's strong, pro-consumer Do Not Call statute is what NJ residents want. It allows those who do not choose to be harassed by telemarketers to protect their privacy and the quiet enjoyment of their homes. The FCC should not be seeking to override states' rights on this issue. The NJ statute serves as a good example of government of, by and for the people. The FCC should protect the American public from special corporate interests, not pandering to those corporate interests.
